About Dino Eliadis

Dino Eliadis is a 14-year project management expert formally trained at the DoD's prestigious Defense System Management College. The DSMC is the premier training ground for program and project managers for the DoD, NASA, and aerospace industry the world over. It is recognized worldwide as the model for systems management training.

Recently he developed a ROI model that provides companies with direct insight into their current fiscal state of project management portfolio. The model gives a very clear picture of how improving project management can increase their bottom-line. He has also written several white papers that help managers understand what they need to do to improve project management across the enterprise.

Dino brought his skills to Tampa Bay more than 10 years ago. He has successfully managed more than 30 projects spanning a variety of different applications and industries for companies across the country. These projects have varied in size from a few weeks and few thousand dollars to over a year and several million dollars.

He has also helped several companies improve their project management practices, conducted training, and establish project management offices (PMO). Clients and employers have included Nokia, Staff Leasing, Yellow Freight, Clark Construction, Epix, Optima Technologies, and Northwest Airlines, to name a few. His project management practices consistently bring projects within 10% of budget and schedule.

While on active duty, Dino managed several project managers and projects himself that totaled well over $25 million dollars. Additionally, he was hand picked by the Center's commander to work with the Software Engineering Institute (SEI) and lead an action team chartered to standardized project management across the organization of 1,600. He also served as an internal consultant and project management coach to officers twice his rank to assure that the proper project management practices were implemented and used to manage and control these major system programs.
